What to Wear?

The right clothes can make the difference between a miserable day and a happy day on the water. In some cases, the right paddle wear is a matter of survival.

How do you know what's right for you? Start with when and where you are paddling. If it's warm weather and warm water, you'll want light clothes that dry quickly and protect you from the sun.

When you're facing more serious conditions and colder temperatures, the key is to dress so that you'll be comfortable while paddling and protected from the cold water. Even if you never flip, you can get chilled and hypothermic from being exposed to splash and spray.

Start with a moisture-management layer, a base layer that wicks perspiration away from your body. Look for wicking, quick-drying material.

An insulation layer adds warmth when it gets colder. Several companies have a new generation of wool garments that don't itch and can be washed—they're good under waterproof layers. There are also some new fleece products that are better for paddlers, which has body-hugging four-way stretch and a windproof membrane.

The outer layer keeps you dry. It can range from jackets and pants designed to protect you from splash and spray, wind and rain, to completely sealed dry suits, with gaskets at the neck, wrists, and ankles to keep out the water.

The standard material has been Gore-Tex, for waterproof breathable protection. Now other companies are introducing their own new waterproof breathable materials.

Many kayakers prefer a dry top along with paddling pants or thermal bottoms, and those also come in a wide range of prices.

Other options for canoeists and kayakers are the wetsuit and its substitutes, known generically as Fuzzy Rubber. They offer insulation but not protection from the wet.

Shoes are important, both to protect your feet, both from rubbing on the interior of the boat and for scouting and portaging. You want a bootie that keeps out rocks and sand and keeps your feet warm.

A kayaker may want a spray skirt. It keeps the sun off your knees, keeps the water from dribbling down your paddle into your lap, and keeps errant waves from splashing into the cockpit and swamping your kayak. It should fit snugly on the cockpit coaming, but be easy to release in the event of a capsize.

And paddlers who tackle whitewater, whether in a kayak, a canoe, or a raft, will want a helmet to protect their brains against hard knocks that may come their way.
